Olive Oil	Helps stimulate synthesis of substances such as collagen, Elastin, proteoglycans, and glycoproteins.
Palm Oil	Imparts a pleasant feel to the skin.
Coconut Oil	Raw material found in soaps.
Palm Kernel Oil	Natural oil used to make soaps.
Orange Essential Oil	Since the 17 th century, orange oil has been used to assist the digestive system, settling the belly. Supporting the body’s detoxification system is orange oil’s medicinal strength, but its characteristically warm, round scent has for centuries imparted a subtle jollity to the spirits.
Clove Essential Oil	Long used to treat fungal infections, the kind that impact nail beds, cuticles, and feet, clove is an anti bacterial as well. It has powerful local antiseptic and mild anesthetic actions, and recently scientific researchers have discovered what traditionalists have known for centuries - that like many spices, clove contains antioxidants to help prevent cell damage.
Cornmeal	Cornmeal is made from corn, and used traditionally as a gentle exfoliate. This age-old method of removing dry, flaky surface skin is highly effective. Each grain of cornmeal is a soft, round granule, unlike salt crystals with their jagged edge that can be irritating to sensitive skin. The rolling of each grain on the skin during external application not only exfoliates and stimulates circulation; it feels wonderfully invigorating to the entire system.

Honey	Whether in absolute form, used for its rich round scent to “perfume” preparations, or used in its whole form to soften and soothe the skin, honey is nature’s most mysterious ingredient. It holds constituents that help heal the skin, protect against infection, and soften and even the complexion to achieve a healthy “glow.
